

New from Charles Darwin University Press...

Written by a long-serving Territory doctor, this book provides an intriguing insider's account of the Northern Territory's health between 1965 and 1985, a time of great changes in the Territory. A useful profile of the Territory population's health - both indigenous and non-indigenous - is provided, along with David Lo's personal accounts of the Territory, the evolution of its health services, and its health professionals during that period. A section on major ailments occurring in the Northern Territory provides an interesting and useful summary for all interested in the health of the Northern Territory population. This is a practical introduction to clinical medicine in the Northern Territory and points to other works for further reference.
